My Passion

Humans are fascinating creatures, complex and hard to figure out. One can go outside to a public area and write a book on what transpires there on a daily bases. Often, the first thought that pops into my head when I interact with other people is, why. Why are they wearing that shirt; Why do they choose those words they talk with; What causes them to act they way they do. My passion is studying people. I see each person as its own unique puzzle, and for me to study and attempt to solve this puzzle, is to figure out what makes this person tick.

To understand what drives to do what they do takes a lot of patience. There is no way to completely solve this human puzzle. Every day brings new experiences. These experiences brings changes to people's personality. How does one solve an ever changing puzzle? This creates the uniqueness of each person. No matter how many people I meet, I never find two the same. It amazes me how vastly different each person is. This is why I like people. I can sit down for hours with someone and never get bored with the conversations that occur. I may never experience what they have been through, but I have their story and their emotions they went through.

Over the years, this passion has helped me develop a strong empathetic personality. Having a collection of people's experiences and emotions along with my own, helps me better study and understand other people. Along with this comes the ability to give great advice. Having access to such a wide network of people and how they handle their lives enables me to better handle my life as well as help others if and when they come to me for advice. After years of this, I still find this to be challenging and fun creating new experiences in other people's lives as well as my own. Studying people is my passion, and my passion is what has made me who I am today.
